FORENSIC CROSS-REFERENCES

1. A Screaming Intuition That Something Is Not Right — Even Though She Kept Smiling

The archive documents the gap between the presented care relationship and the documented conduct. The screaming intuition that something was wrong is now documented evidence. The smile is in the photographic record. The conduct is in the archive.

2. What You Thought Was Paranoia Was Actually Discernment

Every documented instance where Dr. McLean's "paranoia" about institutional conduct was later corroborated by primary-source evidence is documented in the archive. The discernment was correct. The archive proves it. The label "paranoid" is the projection of the people conducting the surveillance.

3. Her Goal Was a Front-Row Seat to Monitor Every Move

The archive documents the mechanism of information collection within trusted relationships. The specific conduct documented in connection with family members — sharing information about Dr. McLean's circumstances, movements, and mental state with institutional actors — constitutes a documented surveillance pattern within a trust relationship.

4. She Placed Your Struggles in the Wrong Frame

The specific mechanism: taking truthful information shared in confidence and reframing it as evidence of instability rather than evidence of institutional persecution. The wrong frame was the "delusional" narrative. Every piece of accurate testimony that was placed in the wrong frame by family-network actors is documented in the archive.

5. She Positioned Herself as Stable While Framing You as Complicated

The Today Show appearance is the documented public version of this positioning. The stable, dependable family member. The complicated one with the mental health history. The framing was constructed. The archive documents who constructed it and what they used to construct it.

6. The IChooseSilence Declaration — The Formal Response to the Documentation

The formal declaration separating from five named family members is Dr. McLean's documented response to the documented conduct of those family members within the context of a 35-year institutional persecution. The declaration is blockchain-sealed. The separation is documented.
